OBAMA'S FREEDOM OF WORSHIP VS. THE CONSTITUTION'S FREEDOM OF RELIGION

The following is excerpted from "Why Is Obama Changing 'Freedom of Religion'?" Paul Cooper, NewsRealBlog.com, June 29, 2010: "Last month the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom's 2010 report revealed grave concern about both President Obama and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton rejecting the term 'freedom of religion' for the term 'freedom of worship' in public pronouncements. Why the change when the First Amendment talks specifically about our freedom of religion and not simply worship? Last November Obama used the term 'freedom of worship' at the memorial service for the victims of the Ft. Hood shooting. A few days later he did it again in speeches in both Japan and China. In December Hillary Clinton also used that terminology three times in a speech at Georgetown University. In January of this year Clinton used the 'freedom of worship' term four times while addressing senators. The response by many religious freedom advocates is fear of what this all means. Nina Shea, director of the Center for Religious Freedom and member of the Religious Freedom commission, believes freedom of worship is limited to private beliefs and prayer but not public activity. She says, 'It excludes the right to raise your children in your faith; the right to have religious literature; the right to meet with co-religionists; the right to raise funds; the right to appoint or elect your religious leaders, and to carry out charitable activities, to evangelize, [and] to have religious education or seminary training.' World Magazine adds, 'That's not an inconsequential change: Freedom of worship means the ability to have church services, which is crucial, but leaves out protection for Christian schools, publications, and Christian compassionate ministries... Freedom of religion means that ministries designed to help prisoners change their lives, or to help the poor enter the workforce, can teach what the Bible teaches. Under freedom of worship, these ministries could become illegal, as they are in many parts of the world.'
